Table XI contains geographical data for all stations reporting during 1888. An asterisk in the column of elevation indicates that the value there given is only approximate. The observers themselves are in most cases the authority for these data. The distribution of the stations is illustrated in plate IV, where the numbers correspond to those in the first column of this table. Table XII is the annual summary for 1889 for such stations as have reported continuously through the year. The daily means, from which the monthly and annual means are computed, are reduced from the arithmetical means of the actual observations by applying the corrections proper to the hours of observation according to the data of volume XXI of the Smithsonian Contributions. In determining the number of rainy days, those were counted in which 0.01 inch or more of...
