Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: .it probably makes little difference what type of strainer is employed as long as the manifold is properly designed and the capacity of the strainer approximately correct, except in so far as the expense and durability are concerned. Manifolds The proper design of the manifold is one of the essentials to a free and perfect washing filter. The requisite is that each square foot of the filter bottom shall always have the same volume and pressure of wash water applied to it that every other square foot has. In order to do this the cross sectional area of the manifold usually decreases as its length increases. Where the filter bottom is large, as in the case of a four-million-gallon unit, the filter bed is generally divided into sections and each section is supplied by a branch of the main manifold, and these in turn reduce as the length increases. The object is to maintain an equal velocity of flow in the manifold through any and all cross sections of the same, both when washing and when filtering. This can only be approximated in practice, but the best results are attained the nearer the attainment is to the ideal. Filter Controllers In the old style filters no effluent controllers were employed. The plant at Lorain, built in 1896-97, had none, and some plants built recently have not been provided with these devices. If the operator possesses sufficient skill and uses care in handling the valves, equally as good...
