Not illustrated. 1905 Excerpt: .journal is in part even more rhapsodical, more despairing, than the first. A highly dramatic passage in it shows that at one time suicide was in his thoughts. Besides great depression of mind and soul, Wagner was far from well physically, and there is a gap in the journal of over a month (November 1 to December 8) occasioned by severe illness. Nevertheless there are, in spots, glimpses of his old brave self afforded by references to his work on Tristan. I shall live forever in it. And with It is easy to supply the blank; and the passage, though brief, points eloquently to the source of his inspiration. it Fills Our Souls Fobeveb Venice, October 18, 1858. A year ago we passed a beautiful day at the Willes . As we were returning from a walk toward the height your husband offered Frau Wille his arm. That left me free to offer you mine. We spoke of Calderon.1--What a good subterfuge he was!--Returned to the house, I seated myself at the new piano.-Even I was surprised at my beautiful playing.--It was an exquisite, all-satisfying day. Have you celebrated it today?--Ah, this period had to bloom for us at least once; now tis past. But its flower has not faded. It fills our souls forever with its fragrance. ffMY LIFE DEPENDS UPON YOU Venice, October 31, 1858. Do you not realise, my child, that my life depends upon you--upon you alone? That I In Zurich Wagner...
