Not illustrated. 1867 Excerpt: .usually aim to buy, to the best price to be obtained, to whoever will buy. J. less an enthusiast upon the subject of home industry, you buy a poorer article at the same price as a better one because it was made or grown in his own country. If the world could suddenly take, producing some one article--say grain, or coal, insurance gold--it would in a short time find such a stock on hand, it to be in the main useless, while other and valuable interests; and sources of wealth had been neglected. All exchanges should be based, on the principle of reciprocity. If other people take from us, we must take theirs: money is merely a medium for effecting the exchange, and of equalizing values; and a surplus in excess of what is wanted for this purpose, is altogether useless and injurious. Let us see where the home industry policy would ultimately end, applying it, say to the United States. The West says: We raise wheat, wool, corn, flax, tobacco, pork, beef, etc.; a small quantity of each suffice for domestic consumption; we will sell the balance to our sister States, and get their money; but we will not buy their products, because we want to keep...
