Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: . . . THE OLD CUSTOM HOUSE AT MONTEREY. There is no historic building in the United States around which cluster memories of incidents of the past more interesting than this homely pile of whitewashed dried mud or adobe, now in a state of rapid decay for the want of proper care and protection. It was erected by the Spanish Government in the early part of the last century and served for all government purposes, executive, administrative, legislative, judicial and military. Upon the successful revolution for Mexican Independence, in 1820-3, was turned over to the representatives of the Mexican Government who at once occupied it. Beneath its tiled roof the Junta or Departmental Legislature met and made local laws like a Board of Supervisors. Here the Collector of Customs gathered in both imported goods and revenue, enforcing the provisions of a tariff amounting usually to not less...
